Individual Disability Income insurance

Are you protecting enough of your income?
Group disability coverage — a great start, but may not be enough.

You work hard and have a lot of accomplishments to show for it — your house, savings, charitable donations, etc. But, are you protecting the one thing that makes those accomplishments possible — your income? After all, you want to assure the foundation of your financial future is strong.

The group long-term disability (LTD) coverage you have through work is a great employee benefit and provides a good start for protecting your income. If you become too sick or hurt to work, the benefit payments work “like a paycheck” to help cover some of your everyday living expenses. But, is it enough?

Did you know?
Things to consider about group disability insurance...

- The benefit payments you receive may be taxable. That means you face even more of an income replacement gap.
- It typically doesn’t cover any bonus or incentive income you earn.
- Those with higher incomes often find the benefits aren’t enough to cover important financial obligations.
- The benefits replace a percentage of income (typically 60 percent before taxes) up to a maximum limit, usually $5,000. Because of this cap, the more you earn, the lower the percentage of your income that’s replaced.

How the benefit cap affects what you could receive

Don’t think your group coverage is enough?

You can protect more of your income by supplementing your existing coverage from work with individual Disability Income (DI) insurance from Principal®.

This additional coverage offers you:
› The ability to replace more of your income since the individual coverage wraps around the existing group coverage.
› Bonus and incentive pay may be covered.
› Income tax-free benefit payments.*
› A policy you own that goes with you wherever your career takes you.

What about your retirement savings?

Not earning an income affects more than being able to pay today’s bills. It also can put retirement saving on hold. DI Retirement Security from Principal is a way to keep your retirement savings on track during a disability.
